Я получил бесплатный обед от частного шеф-повара, который снимал все на камеру, чтобы обучать роботов

Немецкий стартап прислал ко мне домой шеф-повара с камерой. В обмен на бесплатный обед я позволил им записывать каждое движение ножа и ложки, чтобы обучать будущих гуманоидов.

Free Lunch

The uniform for Shift chefs blends elements of a chef's uniform with cyborg qualities. Ali, the chef, was wearing a black apron wrapped around his body. The camera was the size of a GoPro, with a white wire running through his hair. The wire was attached to a smartphone, which was stored in his pocket. It jiggled a bit as he cooked.

I've never had a private chef before in my city, so I was just standing by in the kitchen as he prepared the food, chopping trumpet mushrooms. The finesse of his knife skills go far beyond what my robot could do. My sense of awkwardness on the job was everything was being recorded. I should have been immortalized as robot training data. Even in a messy, my human ego still prevails.

The apartment smelled amazing as Ali got started on the main course, baked salmon with a creamy zucchini sauce, and I began to loosen up. Similar to how I respond when people use Meta's AI glasses to record in public, I initially froze under the weight of being perceived so directly by technology. But as I chomped

Kilic says Shift plans to branch out and eventually offer them at discounted rates, in exchange for data. While the boom of large language models will provide a vast repository of text data, no comparable, vast repository of training robots. That's why the data inside of you while completing tasks, is so valuable that a robot could give you a private chef for a day.

He's optimistic that we'll soon be living with robots that we will have quite good home robots that are not perfect, but won't do all the tasks, but it will do most tasks. robots in 2020."

I'm not worried about these bots gaining consciousness, but I am anxious about the ramifications of physically embodying AI models further and giving them tools. While a Roomba may smear dog poop all over the carpet when it messes up
