

М. Г. ЗИГЛЕР • #СТРИМИНГ • 27 ИЮЛЯ 2026 Г.

YouTube "Hackquires" Peacock

Довольно блестящий ход, возможно, с обеих сторон! Прости, Netflix.

После надвигающегося — ну или возможнопроваливающегося — слияния Paramount Skydance и Warner Bros Discovery в большой гонке стриминговых сервисов появился явно аутсайдер — Peacock. Во многом благодаря недавним масштабным спортивным мероприятиям, таким как Олимпийские игры, сервис не умирал, но и не процветал. Он просто не мог конкурировать с Netflix, Prime Video, Disney+ и в скором времени HBO Max + Paramount+. Так что компания могла либо продолжать бороться, едва сводя концы с концами, как она наконец сделала в прошлом квартале, либо найти новый дом.

Новость о том, что Comcast снова разделилась на две части, создавала ощущение, что почва для этого уже подготовлена. Но мы все были обмануты. Потому что был и другой вариант. Важный.

Вот Лилиан Риццо для CNBC:

Peacock от NBCUniversal официально выходит на YouTube.

Весь контент стримингового сервиса, включая портфолио NBC Sports, включающее НФЛ и НБА, фильмы Universal, такие как франшиза «Миньоны», а также оригинальный контент Peacock и Bravo, например франшиза «Настоящие домохозяйки» и «Остров любви: США», будет доступен подписчикам YouTube Premium в США с начала следующего года.

Google YouTube Premium — это платная версия стриминговой платформы, которая предлагает видео без рекламы и возможность скачивать большинство видео в зависимости от уровня подписки. Сервис предлагает различные тарифные планы по цене от 8,99 доллара в месяц. Peacock Premium в настоящее время стоит 10,99 доллара в месяц.

Хотя мы пока не знаем всех деталей финансовых договоренностей между двумя сторонами, на первый взгляд, это безумная сделка. Похоже, что Comcast продает Peacock YouTube не продавая Peacock YouTube. Да, это выглядит как своего рода "хакерская покупка" для медиаиндустрии.

Знаете, это когда вы фактически покупаете что-то, не испытывая головной боли от настоящей покупки.

Возможно, в этом и есть смысл. Разрешат ли регулирующие органы YouTube купить Peacock? Возможно, но, скорее всего, только в том случае, если они выделяют YouTube TV в отдельную компанию. Ключевым моментом, очевидно, будет вопрос о том, кому на самом деле принадлежат NBC и Universal, но если Comcast сохранит их за собой, какой смысл владеть Peacock? В любом случае любая подобная сделка будет увязана в слушаниях и судебных разбирательствах на месяцы, если не годы. Опять же, см.: Paramount/Warner Bros.

Так что да, в этом, похоже, больше смысла. Конечно, для YouTube. Который теперь может предложить своим подписчикам Premium — долгое время считавшейся одной из самых выгодных подписок в стриминговых сервисах благодаря отсутствию рекламы на YouTube — целый набор новых возможностей.

Honestly, it looks like such a good deal that you have to believe YouTube is going to raise the Premium price, pronto.¹

As for why you'd now sign up for Peacock stand-alone versus YouTube Premium? I don't know. We'll have to see if there are new pricing tiers, I guess. But again, this just sort of looks like YouTube de facto bought Peacock and is now tying it into their offering.

Yes, it's a bundle. But it's likely bigger and better than your typical bundle because it sure sounds like all the Peacock content will be deeply integrated within YouTube itself. It even sounds more integrated than your typical "Channel" offering, since again, it's included with your YouTube Premium package, no separate subscription required.

All of this also further blurs the lines with the aforementioned YouTube TV. But I suspect Google is fine to simply keep that as the mechanism with which to bleed the other cable companies – including Comcast – dry until cable itself is fully dead. And Comcast, knowing that's coming, smartly hitched the wagon:

The partnership announced Monday also extends NBCUniversal's multiyear distribution agreement with YouTube TV, the streaming-only TV bundle run by YouTube, as well as distribution of YouTube, YouTube TV and Premium on Comcast's Xfinity-branded cable TV and Xumo platforms.

It will also see enhance the advertising partnership and capabilities between the two companies, allowing NBCUniversal to monetize advertising for its Peacock content on YouTube's platform. Advertising has become a key driver of streaming growth across media companies.

So yeah, this seems pretty good for Comcast too, if they're simply reading where all of this is heading and getting ahead of it. And that's sort of the framing here:

NBCUniversal's partnership with YouTube was formed after Comcast co-CEO Brian Roberts reached out to YouTube CEO Neal Mohan about nine months ago, according to a person familiar with the matter. Following a meeting between the executive teams that took place at Google offices, the two companies began to brainstorm partnerships such as this, the person added.

The biggest question remains how the actual deal is structured. Beyond direct monetization of their content on YouTube, presumably there's a broader revenue share in place too. The bigger question is if there was some sort of up front, lump-sum payment, or ongoing licensing payments. That feels likely, but we'll see. And if so, that may give some level of exclusivity to YouTube? Maybe Comcast can keep their existing partnerships in place as long as they're more of the aforementioned "Channels" or straightforward bundle variety? Maybe YouTube would even prefer that lest they draw the eye of regulators here. But this type of deep integration may be exclusive to YouTube?

Or maybe YouTube is feeling confident enough in their offering that they don't care about any level of exclusivity here. And maybe they should given that they have 125M Premium subscribers and can upsell the over 2.5B – that's billion – monthly active users of YouTube itself. No one can compete with that. It will be interesting to see how YouTube brands this new premium Peacock content and tries to upsell it.

It will naturally move YouTube into more direct competition with Netflix, shocking no one. That "UGC" label, long affixed as an almost Scarlet Letter on the service is fading, fast. YouTube will now get premium shows and movies but without having to directly commission them. Oh yes, and sports:

Live sports nab the biggest audiences for both streaming and linear TV. YouTube has been increasingly getting into the mix acquiring live sports rights. Last year it aired its first ever live NFL game, and since then the NFL has continued to hold talks with non-traditional media companies like YouTube and Netflix.

YouTube has become a platform for both sports leagues and media companies to host highlights and other game-related content in a bid to attract younger audiences. NBCUniversal's sports-heavy streaming portfolio could complement that effort.

As part of partnership between YouTube and NBCUniversal, NBC Sports will be a production partner for select live sports on YouTube, such as it was for the NFL game last year.

Will this help YouTube attract more NFL games? It certainly can't hurt! And even if they don't, they'll now have access to those on Peacock/NBC! That's on top of the Sunday Ticket which is tied to YouTube TV, but is actually available on YouTube itself as well.

All of this is clearly not great news for Netflix. Not only were they said to be exploring a Peacock add-on option – which still could happen, again presumably as a "Channel" within Netflix as a way for Comcast to continue to hedge – but the bigger issue is that this seemingly vaults YouTube into pole position as the default UI for streaming.

As I wrote just 11 days ago, it felt like that was the real battle brewing between the two – with YouTube now surging ahead. And actually, about five weeks ago, I had an, um, inkling that something like this deal could be the next shoe to drop:

As YouTube TV continues to eat traditional cable's lunch, might we see other regional cable providers in the US hand over the keys to Netflix? Comcast, the largest, would presumably try to do it through Peacock? But Peacock remains a far smaller player. More interesting would be if YouTube tries to get into this game. There's probably too much conflict with YouTube TV, but it increasingly feels like Netflix and YouTube are on a collision course to be the main hub/UI of streaming. I mean, they already are in many ways, but with others' content – including perhaps Peacock and the like.

And here we are. It's beginning to look a lot like Comcast, indeed.

One more thing: This tie-up will certainly help Paramount make the case that they should be allowed to buy WBD. Then again, I've felt that way before...

Previously, on Spyglass...

Can Netflix Become (More Like) YouTube Faster Than...

YouTube is poised to unify the streaming championship belts...

 Spyglass • M.G. Siegler

Netflix Needs a New Shakeup

Outflanked by YouTube, they need a true focus on engagement...

 Spyglass • M.G. Siegler

Comcast is Unbundling... Comcast

The company can't stop cutting itself in two, but who is buying? Netflix? SpaceX?!

 Spyglass • M.G. Siegler

¹ Sigh. Though I guess removing one potential bill from the current streaming insanity is worth it. Hopefully literally! ↩

#streaming #youtube #youtube tv #comcast #nbc #universal #peacock
#entertainment #tech #netflix #paramount #skydance #wbd #sports

Published by:

Member discussion

Spyglass © 2026

Powered by Ghost