КЛЮЧЕВЫЕ МОМЕНТЫ

Согласно последнему Всеамериканскому экономическому опросу CNBC, американцы по-прежнему сильно обеспокоены своим финансовым будущим, несмотря на рост фондового рынка и снижение цен на бензин.

На фоне опасений по поводу роста цен на продукты питания и другие товары рейтинг одобрения президента Дональда Трампа составляет всего 40 %, при этом многие негативно оценивают его действия в отношении экономики и войны с Ираном.

Однако и демократы не в лучшем положении. У партии есть преимущество всего в 4%, когда речь идет о том, какая партия должна контролировать Конгресс.

Всеамериканский экономический опрос CNBC: 25% респондентов с оптимизмом смотрят на экономику и будущее

Согласно последнему Всеамериканскому экономическому опросу CNBC, несмотря на бурный рост фондового рынка и снижение инфляции, общественность настроена так же пессимистично по отношению к экономике, как и в первые годы после пандемии, и все больше обеспокоена стоимостью товаров повседневного спроса демократы страны, но при этом лишь незначительное преимущество демократов в вопросе контроля над Конгрессом.

Опрос 1000 взрослых по всей стране с погрешностью плюс-минус 3,1% показал, что 61% населения пессимистично оценивает текущее состояние экономики и перспективы на будущее. Это самый высокий показатель с декабря 2023 года, когда страна только начала выходить из инфляционного кризиса, вызванного пандемией. Только 25% настроены оптимистично в отношении экономики сейчас и в будущем.

«41% избирателей ожидают ухудшения ситуации, 29% — нет, что оставляет электорат в явно подавленном настроении в преддверии промежуточных выборов», — сказал Мика Робертс, партнер Public Opinion Strategies, республиканской компании, проводившей опрос.

В связи с ростом цен 47% опрошенных сообщили, что сокращают расходы на товары первой необходимости, такие как продукты питания и медицинские услуги. Это на 6% больше, чем в апрельском опросе.

вещи, такие как питание вне дома и расходы на топливо, на 5-7% больше, чем в апреле. Американцы также говорят, что сокращают количество поездок и реже пользуются кредитными картами, чем в апреле.

These numbers come amid a recent decline in oil and gasoline prices and stand in contrast to steady and modest growth reported in national retail sales.

But the national numbers could be driven by spending from the wealthy. The All-America survey finds that 60% of those with incomes below $30,000 are reducing their outlays for essentials, compared with just 35% of those with incomes above $100,000.

The survey's Democratic and Republican pollsters both say the modest drop in gasoline prices over the past several weeks is not enough to offset the lingering effects of both the recent and past surges in prices.

"People are still paying a lot more for stuff than they were a year and a half ago, two years ago, and that's recent enough in memory that it still hurts and it still drives a lot of anger," said Jay Campbell, partner at Hart Research, the Democratic pollster for the survey. "When gas prices drop 50 cents for a month, that's just not enough to make up the difference."

Low marks on the economy

Trump's approval ratings remain deeply underwater, though largely unchanged from disapproving, a point worse than the April survey. Sixty percent disapprove of his handling of the economy, compared with 38% approving. Both changes are within the poll's margin of error but, at -22, place the president the most underwater he has been in his political career.

The survey also found the public disapproving of Trump's handling of the war with Iran by a 63% to 35% margin, and his handling of inflation and the cost of living by a 68% to 31% margin.

Still the Democratic Party has just a 4-point advantage on congressional preference, unchanged from April, as it appears the party is only benefiting modestly from the dissatisfaction with the economy and the Iran war.

"It means Democrats have an advantage at this point now, five months out from the election, but it's not an overwhelming advantage," Campbell said. "It doesn't point to a wave at the moment and I think that's what my baseline is."

Both pollsters pointed to a sharply divided electorate being "locked into" their parties and reluctant to switch sides however much concern they may have with the economy. The survey found, for example, partisans digging in and increasing their support for their chosen party compared with April, largely offsetting each other and leading to no change in the overall preference for congressional control.

It's also an environment where each party has been defining the other by their extremes and having some success doing so.

Half of all voters say they are unlikely to support a democratic socialist candidate, with 32% saying they would support one. An endorsement by the president is somewhat worse, with 52% saying they would not support such a candidate. Worst of all are self-described MAGA candidates, which the survey found 57% of the public said they would be unlikely to support.

Split on the issues

On the most pressing issues, both parties have their own advantages.

security, and a 5-point lead on the second most important issue, protecting democracy.”

But Republicans lead by 22 points on the third issue — immigration and border security — the largest advantage on any of the 10 issues on the list. That’s followed by a 6-point Democratic lead on housing and an 18-point advantage on the cost of healthcare.

Democrats, independents and women, especially women 18-49, put the cost of food as the top issue. So do white voters and voters of color, along with voters in all income groups, except the very top income group who single out “protecting democracy.”

Republicans are the only major demographic group for whom immigration is the top issue. Meanwhile, voters aged 18-34 elevate housing to the top spot, with 46% saying it’s a major issue. The cost of food for the youngest cohort is a distant second at 33%.

Among the starkest divisions in the survey are those surrounding the war with Iran, which has lost support compared with the April survey.

Just 48% of the public believe the military action against Iran is worth it to disrupt the country’s ability to develop nuclear weapons, down from 53% in April. Half the country say it’s not worth it, up from 44% in the prior survey. The president’s net approval on dealing with Iran fell to -28, 3 points worse than the prior survey.

Trump is underwater with parts of his own party on the Iran war. Just 47% of non-MAGA Republicans, who represent about a third of the GOP, approve of the president’s handling of Iran, with 50% approving. By contrast, 86% of MAGA Republicans support the president’s handling of the issue.
