ОСНОВНЫЕ МОМЕНТЫ

Netflix сообщила о выручке и прибыли за второй квартал, которые примерно соответствуют прогнозам Уолл-стрит.

Рост выручки был обусловлен увеличением числа подписчиков, изменением цен и повышением доходов от рекламы.

Компания заявила, что вовлеченность пользователей «в норме», несмотря на недавние сообщения о снижении этого показателя, но также сообщила, что сократит частоту публикации отчетов «Что мы смотрели», которые дают представление о вовлеченности.

Netflix падает из-за слабых прогнозов

Netflix в четверг отчитался о выручке и прибыли за второй квартал, которые примерно соответствовали прогнозам аналитиков. Уолл-стрит внимательно следит за показателями рекламы и вовлеченности компании.

Акции Netflix упали более чем на 7% в ходе торгов в пятницу, поскольку инвесторы, похоже, снова разочаровались в прогнозе прибыли компании.

Вот как показатели Netflix за период, закончившийся 30 июня, соотносятся с прогнозами аналитиков, опрошенных LSEG:

- Прибыль на акцию: 80 центов против прогнозируемых 79 центов
- Выручка: 12,56 млрд долларов против прогнозируемых 12,59 млрд долларов

Выручка Netflix составила 12,56 млрд долларов, что на 13% больше, чем в прошлом году, и лишь немного не дотянуло до прогнозов аналитиков. Рост был обусловлен увеличением числа подписчиков, изменением цен и увеличением доходов от рекламы.

Ранее в этом году Netflix повысил цены на все свои тарифные планы. В четверг компания заявила, что результаты повышения цен соответствуют предыдущим изменениям и ожиданиям.

Netflix ожидает, что выручка в третьем квартале вырастет на 12 %, и считает, что прогноз на 2026 год соответствует более ранним прогнозам. Компания заявила, что сужает прогнозируемый диапазон выручки на 2026 год до $ 51,4 млрд за весь финансовый год по сравнению с предыдущим прогнозом в размере от $ 50,7 млрд до $ 51,7 млрд.

Engagement focus

Questions about engagement were top of mind for analysts during Thursday's earnings call.

The streaming giant called engagement with its content “healthy,” saying live events were a top draw for members, who watched more than 97 billion hours of total content in the first half of this year. The engagement metric has come into focus after reports that viewership for Netflix series drops following the first season.

“I’ll start by saying there is not a linear relationship between viewing hours and

Co-CEO Ted Sarandos also said Thursday that there isn't "any material change" in second season viewership of series versus the first season, following an earlier report that said there was a drop-off. "Our season two fall off has actually slightly improved this year relative to last year, so no changes in release strategies," Sarandos said on the call.

Yet, on Thursday, the company said it would cut back on the frequency of its "What We Watched" reports, which provide a picture of engagement. Following the release of Thursday's report – which gives information on viewership for the first half of 2026 – Netflix will shift to publishing the report annually in the first quarter beginning in 2027.

The company said its goal in separating out when "What We Watched" is published from its earnings results is to keep the focus on financial metrics like revenue and operating profit.

In general, Netflix called out live events as some of its top programming this year, with live events accounting for six of the top 10 new member sign-up days over the past five years.

Still, Netflix noted that while live programming accounts for more than 5% of its content spending, it makes up about 1% of viewing hours.

Netflix noted that it only got into live programming in 2023, following years of growth solely on original content and licensed TV series and movies. Since then, the company has been bulking up on sports rights.

Live sports often pull in the biggest advertising dollars — something that has become important to driving revenue growth for Netflix, particularly as streaming subscriber growth has slowed.

On Thursday, the company said it still expects to roughly double its ad revenue year over year to $3 billion.

Netflix added that it is in "advanced stages" of discussions with advertisers in the games, live events and VR, have attracted solid demand for the company.

The company introduced its cheaper, ad-supported plan to customers in recent years as a new revenue driver. On Thursday, Peters said it was often thinking about its pricing and plan choices, and how to expand offerings.

One option could be a free tier, which Peters said “could make sense in some markets, but we have to be thoughtful about cannibalization of paid tiers.”

“It’s probably also worth noting that having an effective scaled ads business in any candidate country for such an offering is clearly an important enabling factor to make those economics work,” Peters said. “So that’s all to say that free is something that we’re going to continue to consider, but we have no near-term plans to launch something.”

Such changes have come in response to increased competition across the media landscape. In Thursday’s shareholder letter, Netflix noted that the “entertainment industry remains dynamic and competitive.”

Late last year, Netflix made a play for Warner Bros. Discovery’s film and streaming business before ultimately walking away from the deal. The proposed deal set off a flurry of speculation about if Netflix is now interested in buying other assets.

Netflix said in its earnings report its approach hasn’t changed as it will “prioritize reinvestment in the business, both organically and through selective M&A, while maintaining a health balance sheet and ample liquidity.” Prior to its bid for WBD’s assets, Netflix had long called itself a builder, not a buyer.

On the call, Netflix executives said they wouldn’t comment on speculation, but reiterated their past mantra.

“As Ted said, we are primarily builders, not buyers,” CFO Spencer Neumann said. “We have a really high bar.”
